

ogrtmn

@zehra_c

U

the same time, the fact that the same person can be both a subject and an object of a relation is not a contradiction. For example, a person can be both a subject and an object of a relation of being a friend. In this case, the person is both the one who is friends with someone and the one who is friends with them. This is not a contradiction because the relation is not self-referential in a way that would require the person to be both the subject and the object of the relation at the same time. The relation of being a friend is a relation between two distinct individuals, and a person can be both of those individuals.

Similarly, a person can be both a subject and an object of a relation of being a parent. A person can be a parent of someone and also be someone's parent. This is not a contradiction because the relation is not self-referential in a way that would require the person to be both the subject and the object of the relation at the same time. The relation of being a parent is a relation between a parent and a child, and a person can be both a parent and a child.

On the other hand, a person cannot be both a subject and an object of a relation of being a self. This is because the relation of being a self is a self-referential relation. A person is a self, and a self is a self. This is a tautology, and it is not a contradiction. A person cannot be both a subject and an object of a relation of being a self because the relation is self-referential and requires the person to be both the subject and the object of the relation at the same time.

In summary, the fact that a person can be both a subject and an object of a relation is not a contradiction. It is a contradiction only if the relation is self-referential in a way that requires the person to be both the subject and the object of the relation at the same time. This is the case for the relation of being a self, but it is not the case for the relation of being a friend or the relation of being a parent.

